I thought it was very interesting how he has so much gumption despite the prognosis of his cancer diagnosis. I feel that most people in his situation are not as content with the fact that their health will rapidly decline. He is continuing to live his life to the fullest and is not letting fear slow him down. Lots of people I know think they have so much time to do everything we want to accomplish. When something unexpected pops up that might impede our ability to do what we set out to achieve many people just stop doing everything and sulk for the remainder of the time they have.

I feel like I should take more of his ideas into my life. I need to live life to a fuller extent and to be more ambitious. I don't give myself enough credit or encouragement when it comes to making art. I hope to get better and give myself space to grow and learn as an artist. He has a "If you don't succeed, try, try again" attitude, that I feel more people should strive to achieve.
